DIARY JOTTINGS

August is the time for taking holidays (or avoiding taking them if children of school age do not figure in your life, whether as a parent or a teacher!) Those of you who are grand parents may be called upon to perform parenting duties; perhaps a joy or an obligation depending on the children concerned or your general view of the young.

As a former teacher, I find it interesting how you are sometimes made to feel guilty for having the privilege of a long summer break. Indeed a former Secretary of State for Education, whose surname rhymes with a suburb of Brighton, suggested that the summer holidays should be considerably shortened while he worked in an institution which itself closes for the whole of August; and he was educated in a system where the summer holidays are so long most of the teachers would need a refresher on how to do their job before returning!

Many organisations have a break in August (clubs, musical groups etc.) That said, the concept of a total closedown of operations is less common than in the past, even in countries like France famed for transport logjams as Paris empties of its inhabitants for their vacancies.

Journalists talk of August being the “Silly Season” as they search for interesting stories in the absence of anyone doing anything of real import during the month. Then again, some would say that the silly season currently runs the whole year round, at least in Westminster!

Whatever August holds in store for you, make the most of the change in routine and get ready for return to a degree of normalcy in September.
